1. INTRODUCTION AND BACKGROUND

More EU citizens than ever are moving abroad within the Internal Market to find work, marry or retire, leaving family members behind in their country of origin, or are purchasing property and investing in assets abroad. In these circumstances, the application of inheritance taxation to bequests made across borders may become an increasingly contentious issue.

Inheritance and estate taxes generate about 0,5 % of total tax revenues in the EU¹. Even in countries where tax revenues are relatively important (like the United Kingdom or the United States) this share does not exceed one percent². Tax literature lists several economic and social advantages for inheritance taxation. In terms of vertical equity, inheritance taxation is advantageous since, with high zero-rate thresholds, it can be targeted at the rich and used for redistribution. It also meets the efficiency criterion as estates always have an accidental component – the amount of wealth that is simply left over in the hands of the owner at the time of death³. Taxation of at least this part of wealth has no disincentive effect. In this sense, revenue from inheritance taxes could only be replaced by more distortive types of taxation. Social advantages include increasing the labour supply by reducing the value of inheritances to heirs of rich people and providing an incentive for charitable giving.

We have observed that some European countries have recently abolished inheritance taxation. This may be explained by certain drawbacks in such taxes. One is that the rich often avoid them by using tax planning. Therefore, the pre-crisis real estate boom which placed middle-class testators above the zero-rate threshold has meant that such testators have had to shoulder the burden of the tax as they typically had no access to tax planning.⁴ Another disadvantage is the public perception that taxation on death is unfair in that it is taxing wealth that has already been taxed. This increases the political costs of inheritance and estate taxation. Furthermore, as countries have varying inheritance taxation rules, the interaction of these systems often creates difficulties in cross-border situations.

This initiative focuses precisely on these cross-border problems. While inheritance taxation even within a country can have significant impacts on heirs, particularly in the cases of transfers of business on the death of an owner of a small or medium sized enterprise (SME), this initiative does not call into question the existence of inheritance taxes. It looks only at the difficulties that EU citizens can face when they inherit across borders.

In the context of this Impact Assessment the term inheritance tax is used to mean taxes on both estates and beneficiaries on the occasion of the death of a person. Gifts are often made in order to anticipate later inheritances. Such gifts are in many Member States taxed under the same provisions as inheritances. This initiative would therefore cover cases where gifts are covered by the same tax provisions as inheritances.

Note also that income taxes come within the scope of this Impact Assessment only insofar as they apply to inheritances. In most Member States inheritances are taxed under separate rules to income.

Where bilateral arrangements exist with other Member States on eliminating double taxation on inheritances, they are usually separate from the bilateral arrangements on income taxation⁵

There is currently no EU-wide legislation in the area of inheritances and EU Member States do not have comprehensive ways of relieving double taxation in this area. It appears necessary, therefore, to examine actual and potential problems in the application of inheritance taxes in cross-border situations and see how any such problems can be resolved.

Furthermore, the number of problems in the inheritance tax area is increasing. Before 2003, the Court of Justice of the European Union (Court) never dealt with the inheritance tax rules of EU Member States but since then national courts have referred ten cases to the Court. In addition the European Commission has itself received many complaints and queries in this area.

In a Communication of 2006 on "Coordinating Member States' direct tax systems in the Internal Market"⁶, the Commission suggested that appropriate co-ordination and co-operation between Member States can enable them to attain their tax policy goals and protect their tax bases,. The Commission said that it is considering initiatives in several areas, including inheritance tax, in this context.

The recent trends in inheritance taxation show that several Member States have abolished death taxes in recent years while others have lowered their effective taxation on inheritances and/or broadened the scope of tax reductions and exemptions. Another important feature is the relatively low share that inheritance tax represents of the overall tax revenue of all countries.⁷ However, despite these general trends, cross-border problems for EU citizens in this area can, as will be shown below, be very significant and may increase over time.

2. PROCEDURAL ISSUES AND CONSULTATIONS OF INTERESTED PARTIES

2.1. Organisation and timing

The Commission Work Programme for 2011 includes the adoption of a non-legislative initiative to promote coordination of inheritance taxation between the EU Member States.

The Impact Assessment Steering Group was set up in April 2010 by the Taxation Services of the Commission with the participation of the following Commission departments and services: Economic and Financial Affairs, Enterprise, Justice, Internal Market and Services, Legal Service, Secretariat General. The Employment, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities department was also invited and consulted. The Group has been continuously kept updated and consulted throughout the preparation of the impact assessment. It met three times, in April and May 2010 and January 2011.

This Impact Assessment was reviewed by the Impact Assessment Board of the European Commission (the Board) and has been significantly redrafted in order to take the recommendations of the Board into account. In particular, the changes requested concerned the following points: (i) an improved presentation of the scope and scale of the problem by more concisely describing the macroeconomic aspects, by elaborating examples to show the possible considerable effects of the problem for individuals and SMEs, and by further elaborating on how the functioning of the internal market might be affected; (ii) a better explanation of the possible impacts that any change in the current regime could entail for individual cases by providing more concrete indications in the examples as regards the individual tax burden; and (iii) a better explanation of why the effects on Member States' tax revenues are difficult to determine with complete certainty, and an indication of the Member States which could be more affected than others by changes in the current regime.

2.2. Consultation and expertise sought

The Commission has been consulting widely and has received input from various sources on this impact assessment work.

In 2010 the Commission launched two public consultations on the internet. One concerned actual cases of double taxation⁸, including of inheritances. The other, which dealt exclusively with cross-border inheritance tax issues, was designed to obtain views from all interested stakeholders (individual citizens, academic representatives, tax practitioners and organisations) on the extent of cross-border inheritance tax obstacles within the EU and ideas on possible solutions⁹.

The latter consultation ran from 25 June to 22 September 2010, but at the request of several stakeholders, the deadline was later extended to 22 October 2010. The Commission also accepted a number of contributions after the deadline. There were in total 232 replies to the consultation from a broad range of stakeholders, including 205 individual citizens (23 replied directly while 183 responses were submitted through a newspaper with one overlap in that one of those contributions was also sent directly to the Commission); 13 academics and tax practitioners individually or through their associations; 3 non-registered and 9 registered organisations; and 2 public authorities.

Stakeholders reported on possible cases of discrimination, highlighting discrepancies between Member States' inheritance tax systems and shortcomings of existing relief mechanisms to eliminate double taxation and suggested solutions. The impact assessment work also took on board the replies on inheritance tax sent in response to the more general public consultation on double taxation problems. There were two such replies. In addition, some stakeholders expressed their views in reply to both consultations. The main feedback on inheritance taxes received from the two public consultations is summarised in an annex to the present report.¹⁰ The Commission also commissioned and published, as a reference document to the inheritance tax consultation, a study by external consultants on "inheritance taxes in EU Member States and possible mechanisms to resolve problems of double inheritance taxation in the EU"¹¹ (hereafter referred to as the Copenhagen Economics Study). It explored the nature of cross-border inheritance tax problems, i.e. discrimination and double taxation; the economic significance of the problems; and possible policy solutions to the double taxation problems identified.

In addition, in early September 2010, inheritance taxation was discussed in-depth at the 64th Annual Congress of International Fiscal Association (IFA). The Commission contributed a report on the relevant case law of the court. The General Report (hereafter referred to as the IFA General Report) on this subject concluded that further coordination at EU level is necessary¹².

In the margins of the IFA conference, the Commission held a meeting with academics and practitioners on the relevant issues and possible solutions. Experts expressed the view that there may indeed be many cross-border inheritance tax problems that warrant the attention of the Commission and proposed some possible solutions. Another expert meeting was held in December 2010 to discuss both any possible impact on an EU-wide inheritance taxation initiative of the Commission's 2009 proposal for a Regulation on cross-border successions¹³ and the possible technical features of an inheritance taxation initiative.

In November 2010 the Commission presented the main findings of the Copenhagen Economics Study to Member States' tax officials at a meeting of the Commissions' Working Party IV on Direct Taxation. Member States welcomed the Commission's initiative to explore the problems but considered any EU-wide binding solution disproportionate. However, they acknowledged that existing unilateral double taxation relief measures could in some cases be improved.

The Commission services have taken into account all of above-mentioned observations in the present impact assessment.

3. THE PROBLEMS TO BE ADDRESSED – THE “WHY”

3.1. Identification of the problems that may require action

The Commission has established that Member States' inheritance tax rules as applied in cross-border situations may hinder EU citizens from benefiting fully from their right to move and operate freely across borders within the Internal Market and create difficulties for the transfer of small businesses on the death of owners.

The Commission's research so far indicates that citizens and businesses can face two types of inheritance tax problems in cross-border situations. First, they may be exposed to discriminatory application of a Member State's inheritance tax rules concerning the residence of the deceased or the beneficiary, or the location of the assets. Briefly, the term discrimination as used in the present document refers to a situation in which a Member State treats cross-border situations less favourably than purely internal situations, without this difference in treatment being justified by objective reasons.

Second, there is the risk of unrelieved double or even multiple taxation of a single inheritance by several Member States. The absence of appropriate ways of relieving double taxation of inheritances may lead to overall levels of taxation that are appreciably higher than those applicable in situations that are purely internal to one or the other Member State involved.

An increased tax burden, as a consequence of discrimination or unrelieved double taxation, may negatively affect the value of an inheritance and may cause great difficulties for citizens and businesses who take advantage of the right to move and operate freely across borders within the Internal Market.

Experts whom the Commission has consulted suggest that wealthier EU citizens may take account of the risk of double taxation in planning their international successions but the same may not be true of less wealthy individuals who may only realise the extent of the problems when they are actually facing cross-border inheritance tax bills.

As regards the problems related to transfer of business in the case of the death of an SME owner, the Copenhagen Economics Study noted, and some stakeholders (in particular tax practitioners and associations) in their responses to the inheritance tax consultation agreed, that both discrimination and double taxation can create barriers to business continuity.

Member States' tax systems must respect the fundamental freedoms, notably the rules relating to the free movement of workers, services and capital and the freedom of establishment (Articles 45, 49, 56 and 63 Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union - TFEU), as well as the general principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality (Art. 18 TFEU). Nevertheless, these rules do not provide protection against unrelieved double (or multiple) taxation as such¹⁴, although this phenomenon disadvantages cross-border situations compared to purely national situations. In this regard, it may also be observed that the accumulation of taxes imposed by more than one State might lead to results that, in some Member States at least, would be considered as confiscatory and thus unlawful, had these results been brought about by the provisions of that State alone.¹⁵

3.2. Causes and drivers

The problems arise from Member States' tax laws or private laws on inheritances, or a combination of both.

As regards the discrimination problem, when individuals inherit property or other assets across borders, they may be subject to inheritance tax rules which conflict with the EU non-discrimination principle.

The Court ruled in eight out of ten cases examined since 2003¹⁶ that the inheritance tax laws at issue were incompatible with the EU treaty rules because the laws provided for less favourable rules where either the assets or the deceased person/donor or indeed the beneficiaries were located outside the Member State applying the inheritance taxation. These Court decisions have brought a certain amount of clarity and certainty to this matter. However, it is also true that Court actions may involve high costs for both taxpayers and administrations. Moreover, in many instances, it may not be entirely clear what consequences a ruling involving legislation of one Member State should have on legislation of another Member State. The current legal approach also tends to be asymmetrical in its effects in that, even where Member States are obliged as a result of a ruling to introduce new tax rules, they often do so in vastly differing ways.

¹⁴ Case C-67/08, Block. [2009] ECR I-883.

¹⁵ For instance in Belgium, the Wallon tax rate of 90% for non-related persons, on inherited parts exceeding a certain threshold, has been declared unconstitutional (Decision 107/2005). The German Constitutional Court has ruled that inheritance tax must not lead to a situation in which, from the perspective of an owner whose thinking is informed by economic considerations, the inheritance appears economically meaningless: German Constitutional Court, order of 22 June 1995, 2 BvR 552/91, BVerfGE 1993, pp. 165 et seq.

¹⁶ Case C-364/01 Barbier was the first case, followed by case C-513/03 van Hilten-van der Heijden, case C-464/05 Geurts, case C-256/06 Jager, case C-11/07 Eckelkamp, case C-43/07 Arens-Sikken, case C-67/08 Block, case C-510/08 Mattner, case C-25/10 Missionswerk Werner Heukelbach and case C-132/10 Halley as the most recent example.

With regard to the double or even multiple taxation problem, this can arise because of the significant differences in international private laws, and in the private and tax laws of Member States, in the field of inheritances in addition to the widely varying rules in Member States concerning how an inheritance is taxed.

First, there may be a conflict between Member States' rules concerning which inheritance law is applicable to a succession which involves cross-border elements¹⁷.

Second, Member States' national private laws differ considerably. There are common law and civil law systems and there are considerable variations even between those Member States that apply one or other of these two systems. A basic difference in concept between the civil law and common law systems concerns the transfer of assets. The majority of civil law countries follow the principle of direct transmission, whereby the inheritance is directly transferred from the deceased person to the heirs who are then responsible for paying the inheritance tax. Meanwhile, common law countries generally require the assets first to be transferred to a personal representative who deals with the administration of the estate including the payment of all taxes due and then transfers the net assets to the heirs. There is the possibility that tax paid by the personal representative may not be credited against inheritance tax due by another person in another country. Some contributors noted also the difficulties concerning the civil law countries' treatment of trusts, which are characteristic features of the common law concept of inheritances.

In addition to the differences in the relevant international private law and substantive inheritance law rules, Member States' domestic inheritance tax systems also differ significantly, as will be seen below. Eighteen EU Member States in total levy taxes upon the death of a person while nine (Austria, Cyprus, Estonia, Latvia, Malta, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia and Sweden) have neither an estate tax nor an inheritance tax, although some tax inheritances under other tax laws. All of these laws may clearly have an impact on cross-border mobility of people and assets within the EU.¹⁸

3.3. The scope and scale of the problem

It appears from the recent increase in court cases and from the complaints and enquiries that the Commission receives, that cross-border inheritance tax issues are becoming a matter of increasing concern to EU citizens¹⁹. This conclusion can also be supported by the replies to the public consultations mentioned above

3.3.1. Discrimination

In recent years, the problems of tax discrimination related to cross-border inheritances have become increasingly evident. The Commission has commenced infringement proceedings against several Member States over aspects of their laws. Furthermore, the Court decided in eight out of ten cases

¹⁷ The Commission has proposed a Regulation which, inter alia, would ensure that a single set of rules would apply to an inheritance, irrespective of where the different assets are located, without aiming to harmonise the national substantive rules on successions. More on the link between the draft Regulation and the present inheritance tax initiative could be found under 4.2.

¹⁹ See Annex 5 on "Approximate type and number of inheritance tax questions 2006 -2009" received by the Your Europe Advice service.

examined since 2003 that the national inheritance tax and gift tax rules of the Member States in question breached EU rules on the free movement of capital (Article 56 EC Treaty, now Article 63 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union – TFEU) or the freedom of establishment (Article 43 EC Treaty, now Article 49 TFEU).

The principle of non-discrimination is a central element of the Treaty freedoms. According to the well-established case-law of the Court, discrimination can result from treating differently situations which are comparable, or treating in the same way situations which are different. In order for a national scheme providing for a difference in treatment to be compatible with the Treaty freedoms, it must concern situations which are not objectively comparable or be justified by an overriding reason in the general interest. However, these provisions may not in any event be more restrictive than is necessary in order to achieve the aim pursued; they must, in other words, be consistent with the principle of proportionality.

Moreover, according to the case-law of the Court, the rules regarding equality of treatment forbid not only overt discrimination by reason of nationality but also all covert forms of discrimination which, by the application of other criteria of differentiation, lead to the same result.

The Court, in applying these principles to Member States' inheritance tax provisions, has stated that such provisions may be considered in breach of the free movement of capital when:

- they provide for different rules for the valuation of assets that are part of the inheritance, depending on whether these assets are located within the taxing Member State or abroad;
- they restrict the deductibility of debts/liabilities related to assets that are part of the inheritance of non-residents;
- they provide for a higher rate or less favourable treatment in general with respect to non-residents;
- they provide for a higher rate or less favourable treatment in general with regard to inherited assets located abroad or otherwise connected with the territories of the other States, for example for inheritances of family undertakings which employ workers in another Member State, compared to family undertakings which employ workers in the same Member State.

Example 1 – the Jager case, C - 256/06

Mr Jager, a French resident, inherited from his mother (a German resident at the time of her death) assets situated in Germany valued at DEM 119 015 and land in France used for agriculture and forestry valued at FRF 5 444 666 (DEM 1 618 152), making up together a net estate of DEM 1 737 167. The German inheritance tax rules imposed taxation on the entire estate of a person who died while domiciled in Germany. Assets situated outside Germany were also subject to German tax, albeit with a credit granted for foreign inheritance tax payable on those foreign assets. The assets located in France were valued for German tax purposes at their fair market value, whereas a special valuation procedure existed for identical German assets, the result of which meant a tax value of only 10% of their fair market value. In the present case such a 10% valuation applied to the French agriculture and forestry land would have given a taxable base of approximately DEM 160 000. After deduction of a personal tax free amount of DEM 400 000 no German tax would have been applicable to the entire inheritance. The Court ruled that the German valuation provisions were discriminatory, stating that it is illegal for a Member State to have a favourable mechanism for the calculation for inheritance tax purposes of the value of domestic immovable property, while setting the value of property situated abroad at the normal market value.

Example 2 – the Eckelkamp case, C-11/07

Ms Eckelkamp died in Germany. She had signed a document acknowledging a debt which she owed to one of the heirs and granted him a mandate to encumber an immovable property situated in Belgium valued at EUR 200 000 with a mortgage as a security for repayment of that debt in the amount of EUR 220 000, plus EUR 11 000 in interest. Under Belgian tax legislation, different tax regimes applied for inheritance, depending on where the testator resided at the time of his death. Inheritance tax was due on the value of the whole gathered estate if, at the time of his death, the deceased was resident in Belgium. In contrast, in the case of a person who was not resident in Belgium at the time of his death, transfer tax was charged on the value of immovable property situated in Belgium and pertaining to the gathered estate. In the first case, debts and liabilities pertaining to the inheritance were taken into account for the assessment of the inheritance tax. On the contrary, no debt and liability could be deducted in cases where transfer tax was due. As Ms Eckelkamp was not residing in Belgium at the time of her death, the Belgian tax authority refused to take any debts into account for the purpose of assessing the transfer tax due. The transfer duties payable were estimated at EUR 110 000. Had the Belgian law allowed the deduction of the debt over the estate, the value of the estate for inheritance tax purposes would be nil. The Court decided against these Belgian rules, stating that it is illegal for a Member State not to allow mortgage-related charges to be deducted from the value of property if at the time of death the person whose estate was being administered was residing in another Member State.

Example 3 – the Maria Geurts case, C-464/05

Mr. Vogten was a Belgian resident living in Belgium at the time of his death. His heirs, who were also resident in Belgium, inherited shares in two Dutch companies. After deduction of liabilities, the taxable estate amounted to EUR 3 598 717.33. On this estate they paid tax of EUR 839 485.60. The Belgian tax law granted an exemption from inheritance taxes for shares in a family undertaking but only on condition that the undertakings employed at least five full-time workers in the Flemish Region in the three years preceding the death of the deceased. The Dutch companies met the criteria of family business employing nine and eighteen workers, who, however, were not residents of the Flemish Region. If they were, the exemption would have applied. The Court established that Member States cannot deny an exemption to inheritances of family undertakings which employ at least five workers in another Member States when it would allow such an exemption from inheritance tax if the five workers had been employed in the same Member State.

The examples described above show that the tax discrimination of cross-border inheritances can lead to a considerably higher overall level of taxation. This may give rise to significant social and economic impacts if the individuals concerned, who are unaware of the fact that the taxation is discriminatory and therefore illegal, even have to take out a loan or sell the inherited property in order to pay the tax bills. Some Member States provide exemptions or special relief for transfers of family owned and closely held businesses upon death.²⁰ Any such exemptions must be applied in a non-discriminatory way. Indications that some of these schemes and other provisions of Member States' inheritance tax rules could contain possible discriminatory features can be found in the IFA General Report and in the various national Branch Reports discussed at the above-mentioned IFA Congress; in the Copenhagen Economics Study; and in replies to the inheritance tax public consultation. The responses to the consultation mostly concerned the tax laws of Spain, the United Kingdom, Belgium and Germany. The Copenhagen Economics Study highlights that while Member States have made progress in reducing the discriminatory elements in their national tax provisions, a large number of Member States still have potential discriminatory rules with respect to cross-border inheritance taxation. In this respect, the competent Commission services are currently examining the identified problems with a view to asking Member States to amend the relevant laws if they do indeed involve a conflict with the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU.

3.3.2. Unrelieved double taxation

Enormous variety of rules in Member States' inheritance tax systems

Different taxable person/event Some Member States apply inheritance tax on the heirs, so that the taxable event is the enrichment of the beneficiary, while other Member States apply estate tax on basis of the estate, in which case the taxable event is the transfer of property. (Hereafter, the term "inheritance tax" refers to both types of taxes). Therefore it is possible that for the same inheritance different persons can be taxed in different Member States. Tax complications may also arise if a civil law Member State considers the trust or a personal representative as a different taxable person to the beneficiary or regards the testator as the owner of the trust property and charges tax on the trust on the death of the testator.

Different personal nexus rules In the case of both taxes on estates and taxes on beneficiaries, tax liability is determined on the basis of a connecting factor or "personal nexus", which can be the residence, domicile or nationality of the deceased, or the residence, domicile or nationality of the beneficiary. Some countries apply more than one of these factors. This may mean that, for instance, an individual can be "domiciled" for inheritance tax law purposes in one country and at the same time be "habitually resident" under the inheritance tax law of another and even be a national of a third country under its inheritance tax law. Some Member States even apply taxation on the basis of the personal nexus of either a deceased or an heir.

Table 2: Principles for determining the personal nexus of the deceased or heir(s)

Principle	Member States using principle
Residence principle	Belgium, Czech Republic,* Denmark, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Slovenia, Spain.

* Czech Republic refers to 'permanent address'. Details on the applied personal nexus rules are contained in Annex 3 Only Member States with an estate tax and/or inheritance tax are included in this table.

Location rules In addition to taxing on the basis of personal nexus, most Member States apply inheritance tax to assets located in their jurisdictions. Tax can be applied on the basis of the location of the inherited property even if neither the deceased nor the beneficiary has a nexus with the country of location. Furthermore, the types of assets concerned by the "situs" taxation rules may vary from country to country.

Diverging definitions of terms Furthermore definitions and meanings of the "personal nexus" and "situs" terms can differ from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, so that two countries using the same nexus (e.g. both use domicile) may both claim tax on the same estate. In addition to these divergences, stakeholders – in particular tax practitioners and associations - also highlight difficulties with determining the tax residence of the deceased, such as possible complications related to temporary residence. In addition, several Member States apply anti-abuse measures which provide for an extended concept of residence or domicile.

Interaction with gift taxes Another measure to combat tax avoidance (namely to avoid the circumvention of inheritance tax upon death by gifts inter vivos) is to levy gift taxes in addition to inheritance taxation. For this purpose, many Member States aggregate gifts made by the same donor to the same recipient during a certain period of time and tax the donor or the recipient on that basis. Such aggregation periods vary from Member State to Member State. Issues also arise with creditability of previously paid gift taxes against inheritance taxes. In general, the problems in the area of gift taxes are similar to those in the field of inheritance taxes; therefore the initiative that is the subject of this impact assessment could be applied to gift taxes as well, in particular if Member States' domestic provisions tax gifts and inheritances under the same provisions.

High tax levels in certain cases Double taxation problems may also be exacerbated by the fact that some Member States apply high inheritance tax rates for certain beneficiaries and the tax-free base amounts also vary to a considerable extent. The rates may be higher, reaching as much as 80%, over low thresholds in cases where the deceased and the beneficiary are not related. Many stakeholders, mostly individual citizens, point to such inordinately high rates and lack of exemptions for bequests to persons other than immediate family. The high effective tax rates in Member States are illustrated in Table 4 below. The issue is not the differences between Member States in effective tax rates but the fact that two Member States apply taxation at sometimes high levels without double taxation relief.

The above-mentioned great variations in the basis for taxation (further complicated by the different definitions) can give rise to double taxation. The conflicts can be categorised as follows:

Table 5: Types of conflicts that may result in double taxation

Type of conflict	Description of conflict
Personal nexus - Situs	The same bequest is taxed twice, first by the Member State where it is located under its 'situs rule', and then in the Member State where deceased or the beneficiary (or both) have their personal nexus. A frequently occurring example would be where a testator had a home both in the Member State in which he lived and died and in another Member State. Both Member States could tax the holiday home, one on the basis of personal nexus and the other on the basis of situs.
Personal nexus-personal nexus	Differences in the personal nexus rules or in taxation of the estate v taxation of the beneficiary mean that the same deceased or heir is taxable in two Member States or the deceased is taxed in one country and the beneficiary is taxed in the other.
Situs-Situs	Diverging rules for determining the location of an asset mean that the same asset is taxed by more than one Member State. Problem most likely for intangible assets such as shares.

Limitations to existing tools to eliminate the double taxation of inheritances

At present, in the absence of appropriate tax relief mechanisms there is no comprehensive solution to the problem of double taxation.

Limitations of existing unilateral mechanisms to relieve double taxation

The IFA General Report, the Copenhagen Economics Study and a broad range of respondents to the public consultations all claim that Member States generally have inadequate domestic mechanisms to relieve cross-border double taxation of inheritances. These domestic provisions are often minimal, leaving much to administrative interpretation. Furthermore, as the IFA General Report remarks, they are often modelled on relief provisions for income tax purposes and therefore they may not take into full account the specific issues regarding inheritance taxation; several sets of circumstances that can give rise to double taxation of inheritances are not common in the area of income taxation.²¹ In general, these unilateral relief provisions are targeted at the "personal nexus – situs" conflict and the two other types of conflicts can remain unaddressed.

²¹ See Annex 1 for more on the differences and similarities between income and inheritance taxation.

* The definitions of foreign located assets differ. This has been highlighted with regard to Germany as a result of the Block case – see below. Unilateral relief is not normally given in cases where the assets in question would not be taxed under the location rules of the Member State concerned, if they were situated in that Member State.

As highlighted above, there are many differences between Member States' inheritance laws and tax systems. These mismatches can potentially cause double taxation which cannot be addressed comprehensively by existing unilateral mechanisms. The following problems arise in particular:

Taxes and persons covered First, these unilateral mechanisms may have a limited scope as regards the taxes and persons covered. Furthermore, it may not always be possible to credit previously paid gift taxes on the same assets or foreign local inheritance taxes, i.e. taxes applied by political subdivisions at local rather than national level, or income taxes or stamp duties on inheritances. In this respect, many contributors to the inheritance tax consultation emphasised the need for a pragmatic, rather than formalistic, approach regarding the characterisation of the foreign tax to be credited.

Assets covered In addition, relief may only be granted for foreign taxes paid on certain foreign property, such as foreign immovable property. Furthermore, the relief may exclude foreign tax on local assets i.e. assets located within the territory of the Member State granting relief. Some contributors mentioned further limitations, deriving from the diverging definitions between the different tax systems on what qualifies as immovable or movable property. Conflicting definitions of creditable foreign located assets, in particular in relation to bank assets, were identified as a serious concern for stakeholders, especially for individual citizens and tax practitioners. In this respect a great deal of reference was made to the Block case (Case C 67/08), where bank assets held abroad did not qualify as foreign located assets eligible for unilateral relief.

Calculation rules The significant differences between Member States' rules for calculating the value of assets may also lead to divergences in the net amount to be taxed. Incomplete tax credit due to different valuation methods or the different allocation of debts was widely reported as a serious shortcoming. So was the fact that Member States generally limit foreign tax relief to the amount of domestic tax due on those assets. Another constraint can be limiting the amount of the foreign creditable tax to the tax paid abroad by the heir as opposed to the foreign taxes levied on the entire estate.

Timing issues Member States also vary considerably in their rules deeming when assets are transferred and taxes are due. This means that payment of the foreign tax may occur after the final domestic tax is levied and not all countries permit such later payment to be credited.

Conditional relief Another issue which stakeholders (in particular associations of tax practitioners) mentioned was the fact that unilateral relief was subjected to reciprocity or to the discretion of the competent authority.

Limitations of bilateral tax conventions

Member States have few bilateral conventions in this area and they do not seem to be negotiating more in recent years. In fact, there are only 33 bilateral inheritance tax treaties between Member States out of a possible total of 351²². Furthermore, even these few conventions are not always efficient in eliminating double taxation. Stakeholders (in particular associations of tax practitioners) highlighted the limited availability of treaty relief for foreign located property and varying rules regarding allocation of taxing rights in those tax treaties. Another problem is that the treaties do not normally cater for situations where more than two Member States may have taxing rights over an inheritance (e.g. in cases where immovable property is located in one Member State, while the deceased was previously resident in a second Member State and the heir is resident in a third). These situations can occur more frequently in this area compared to income taxation.

Many bilateral conventions are based on the OECD Model Tax Convention on estates, inheritances and gifts, which dates from 1982. The OECD Model allocates taxing rights on the basis of giving priority to the State of location in the case of immovable property and movable property of permanent establishments or fixed bases. Otherwise the property should be taxed in the Contracting State where the deceased or the donor was domiciled at the relevant moment. The Model also provides for tie-breaker rules in cases where this person is regarded as domiciled in both Contracting States. The OECD Model contains both the exemption and the credit methods, leaving it to the Contracting States to decide which method they apply to eliminate double taxation.

The IFA General Report notes several shortcomings in the OECD Model, including the following:

- The taxes covered are taxes imposed by reason of death and not on occasion of death. That means that registration taxes levied on the transfer of real estate are outside the scope as are capital gains and income taxes applied on bequests. Therefore no foreign tax credit can be provided in those cases.
- In regard to the fiscal domicile rules, the Model prevents the use of any extended domicile provision, but provides no common solution for problems related to deaths during periods of temporary residence.
- Credit for foreign taxes levied on a different taxable person (e.g. credit against inheritance tax levied on a beneficiary in respect of estate tax levied on the deceased in another country) is left for bilateral negotiations
- Discrimination is not fully eliminated, as domestic provisions that, inter alia, contain more restrictive rules for the valuation of foreign located assets or the deduction of foreign debts, compared to domestic located assets and debts, are not expressly prohibited.

²² 27 X 26/2 double taxation treaties. Even those countries which do not have inheritance taxes would need to have arrangements with other countries to allow relief for other types of taxes levied on inheritances.

Experts at the IFA Conference suggested that the main reasons why Member States are not negotiating more inheritance tax treaties may include the potential complexity of such treaties as a result of the different structures of countries' inheritance tax systems, the priority given by tax administrations to more recurrently applied taxes such as income taxes, the limited magnitude of foreign investment made directly by individuals, and their assumption that the existing unilateral reliefs provide for comprehensive solutions. Above all, the reality is that most Member States apply taxation to heirs rather than to the deceased's estate so the Model may no longer be very relevant.

3.3.3. Quantification of the problem

The following section presents an estimate for total taxation of cross-border inheritances in the EU. Discrimination is a violation of fundamental freedoms, and as such, is a problem irrespective of the material harm it causes. For the double taxation issue, it is important to note that, due to the relief provisions in place, not all inheritances are twice taxed or are completely taxed twice. Nevertheless the total amount of taxes on cross-border inheritances is indicative of the scale of the double taxation and discrimination problems.

Unfortunately, there is no EU-wide dataset available which can provide specific information about the amount of inheritance taxes or the value of assets that are the subject of inheritance tax in more than one country. During the impact assessment process, the Commission asked an external consultant, the above mentioned Copenhagen Economics, to collect this information. The public consultation also included questions to this effect. As these attempts to collect information were not successful, it is necessary to draw on proxies, namely inheritance tax revenues in Member States.

It seems valid to assume that those who own property in a foreign country are wealthy and therefore this type of inheritance is likely to involve larger values than an average domestic inheritance case. However, since this is but one type of cross-border inheritance case, such a claim cannot be made generally in regard to cross-border inheritances. For this reason, we assume that the average value involved in cross-border inheritance cases equals the average value involved in domestic inheritance cases.

Data is available on the average inheritance tax (that is, inheritance tax or estate tax or transfer duties etc. collected per death) for each country in 2008. The weighted average of inheritance tax across the EU determined in this way is about EUR 5 200 (See table 7 for details).

The Copenhagen Economics Study estimates the annual number of cross-border inheritance cases as follows:

Table 8: Estimate of number of cross-border inheritance cases per year in the EU

	Number of potential cases
Cases due to foreign located assets	32 000 – 44 000

The Impact Assessment on the proposal for a Regulation to deal with cross-border successions (SEC (2009) 410 final - hereafter the Cross-border Succession Impact Assessment) uses a higher estimate of 450 000 cases. However, the Copenhagen Economics Study includes the caveat that the methodology used is likely to underestimate the actual figures. That is because the figures could only take account of cross-border cases of real estate ownership and not of other assets such as bank savings. Copenhagen Economics states that, as the financial crisis caused considerable fluctuation in asset prices, it is difficult to draw conclusions from the data at hand on the tendency in private portfolio investments.

Therefore, we continue using the range provided above, namely a range of 290 000-360 000 potential cases per year as a conservative estimate. Multiplying these figures by EUR 5200 yields the range of EUR bn 1.5-1.9 as the upper limit for the aggregate extent of the problem of double taxation of inheritances per year.

To give some indications of the distributional effects across Member States, employment-related migration flows are the most significant in terms of number of people. At the same time, we can assume that the migration flow from North to South derives from individuals who can afford to move in order to enjoy a pleasant climate and are, therefore, more likely to own property abroad. Therefore, the latter migration flow seems to be more relevant as regards distributional effects across Member States.

As mentioned above, revenue from domestic and cross-border inheritances taxes combined account for less than 0.5% of total tax revenues in EU Member States. Therefore, cross-border cases alone must account for far less than that figure. However, looking at the double taxation problem at micro level, the Copenhagen Economics Study suggests that double taxation, when it happens, can have an enormous impact on the individuals actually concerned. Note also that, while the tax rate in case of close family member heirs is low in general, it can reach 60-80% in some Member States for large inheritances received by non-relatives. Thus, while at the macro level the problem appears not to be too critical, given the small share of total tax revenues, at the individual level, some citizens can be affected heavily.

The following examples, based on cases reported through the Your Europe Advice services illustrate real-life examples of effective double taxation of cross-border inheritances. The examples show the considerable impact of the problem for the individual citizen affected. For reasons of data protection, we used false names. As taxpayers rarely provide figures in their complaints, we used our own estimations based on research to elaborate on the possible social and economic impacts of the following real-life examples. Prices of real estate are taken from the offers available on the market at the time of writing the present report.

CASE 1 Filip, a Polish citizen resident in Poland, inherits moveable and immoveable property in Belgium from his uncle resident in Brussels. Filip must pay inheritance tax in Belgium on the property because the deceased was a Belgian resident. Belgian tax amounts to 60% of the net assets. In addition Filip must pay nearly 12% of Polish inheritance tax on the assets because he is a Polish resident. There is no bilateral treaty in place to avoid double taxation between the two countries. In addition, Poland has no domestic provision to provide relief for foreign inheritance taxes.

Assuming that the inherited property was a house in Brussels valued at EUR 232 000 and bank and investment assets valued at EUR 193 000, the Belgian tax would amount to EUR 255 000. The Polish tax would be a further 12% of the total value of the assets = 51 000. The liquid assets would not be sufficient to cover the tax bills arising in the two countries, and Filip could find himself in a situation where he had to sell the house. Since he would be under time pressure to pay the taxes, the price he gets for the house might be much below the level of valuation for inheritance tax purposes.

Peter is a Dutch citizen pursuing his career in France. He inherited a property in France from his deceased life partner who was also a Dutch citizen and who had lived in France for the previous 6 years. Their relationship had not been formalised. Peter had to pay French inheritance tax in view of his residence in France and of the fact that the property concerned was located in France. However, he also had to pay inheritance tax in the Netherlands because his deceased life partner was deemed to have been resident in that State. For the purposes of inheritance tax, Dutch nationals are deemed to have resided within the national territory for 10 years following the date they leave the Netherlands to live abroad. The tax applied by France amounted to nearly 60% of the net assets. The tax applied by the Netherlands amounted to an additional 12.5%. Under the legislation applied by the Netherlands, foreign taxes are deductible as a liability on the inheritance received and, therefore, the tax applied by France led to a reduction of the taxable base in the Netherlands. Nevertheless, double taxation was not fully eliminated and the total tax due on the property concerned was higher than it would have been had the inheritance been confined to any one of the two Member States concerned.

CASE 3 Jette, a Danish national, inherited a summer house in Portugal and a long term savings account in Denmark from her uncle who was domiciled in Denmark. Jette must pay Portuguese stamp duty amounting to 10% of the net value of the summer house because Portuguese law subjects transfers on the occasion of death to transfer tax. Moreover, she must pay Danish inheritance tax on both the Danish assets and the Portuguese summer house because under Danish rules, worldwide property of the deceased is subject to inheritance tax in the hands of Danish resident heirs, at a rate in her case of effectively 34%. The Portuguese stamp duty cannot be credited against Danish inheritance tax because it is a transfer tax and not strictly speaking inheritance tax.

Assuming that the summer house in Portugal is valued at EUR 125 000, and that there is EUR 75 000 in the long term savings account, Jette might have no other choice left but to either sell the house, in addition to liquidating the savings account, to pay the taxes due, as the Portuguese stamp duty would amount to EUR 12 500 and the Danish inheritance tax would be around EUR 68 000.

3.4. Who is affected?

All EU citizens, businesses and other entities subject to inheritance taxes are potentially affected by these issues.²³ EU citizens may be deterred from moving or investing abroad if they or their heirs will suffer from high inheritance taxes as a result of the move or investment. SME organisations²⁴ have pointed to the particularly damaging effects of inheritance taxes on small businesses. However, in reality it is generally the actual application of inheritance taxes to transfers of businesses to which SME organisations object rather than the application of double inheritance taxes. The European Family Businesses – GEEF organisation pointed out in its response to the public consultation that even a single application of inheritance tax can pose challenges to family businesses. These problems can then be aggravated in cross-border situations. As stated above, the present report concentrates on cross-border inheritance tax obstacles and does not call into question the existence of inheritance taxes. However, solutions to the cross-border difficulties identified would also benefit those who inherit SMEs across borders.

²³ Note that the main addressee of an inheritance tax is the individual citizen, not legal persons such as companies.

²⁴ See, for example, position paper for Conference "transfer of Ownership in Private Business – European Experiences", 25-26 March, 2010: http://www.ownershiptransfer2010.org/wp-content/uploads/2010/03/transferofoownership_newsletter4_en.pdf

As regards third country nationals, free movement of capital extends to flows between Member States and third countries. Thus, any action of the Commission regarding the application of the rules on free movement of capital would normally also extend to such flows. However, third country nationals would not be covered by actions of the Commission to guarantee other fundamental freedoms, based on notions of discrimination on grounds of nationality, because such actions would be limited to nationals of Member States. It remains of course possible for Member States to unilaterally extend any rights to third country nationals. As far as double taxation is concerned, since this is not as such incompatible with Treaty freedoms, any action of the Commission in this area can be limited to intra-EU situations.

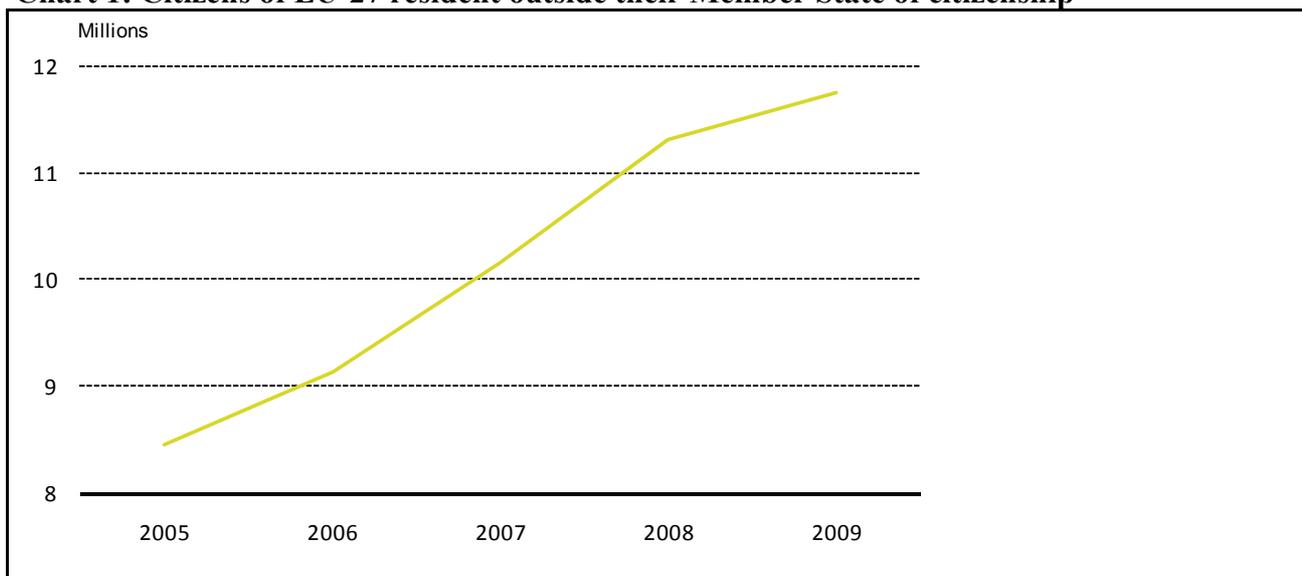

3.5. How would the problem evolve if no action is taken (baseline scenario)?

With a steadily increasing tendency in migration and cross-border ownership of assets within the EU, there are clear and robust indications that the problems will increase in magnitude over the coming years.

The Cross-border Succession Impact Assessment also concludes that the magnitude of the problem related to cross-border successions is very likely to increase in the future.

The following chart provides for the migration indicators²⁵:

Chart 1: Citizens of EU-27 resident outside their Member State of citizenship

Source: Eurostat.

Regarding cross-border ownership of assets within the EU, several sources have concluded that the tendency to foreign home ownership is increasing.²⁶ The Copenhagen Economics Study assumes that cross-border real estate ownership in the EU increased by 10-50% between 2002 and 2010.²⁷

²⁵ It is worth emphasising that the number of deaths of migrants (i.e. cases due to foreign-located deceased) is just one of the three main types of cross-border inheritance situations. Consequently, we took into account also the foreign-located heirs.

²⁶ See Table 4.2 on page 64 of the Copenhagen Economics' Study, on tendencies in foreign home ownership.

²⁷ See page 70 in the Copenhagen Economics Study.

Chart 2: Cross-border portfolio investments within EU-27

Source: IMF Coordinated Portfolio Investment Survey, <http://www.imf.org/external/np/sta/pi/datars1.htm>

This chart shows a massively growing trend in cross-border portfolio investment. Given these indicators, we may expect cross-border inheritance tax problems to grow in the future even irrespective of the trends in cross-border mobility.

With the increasing cross-border movement of EU citizens and the growing amount of cross-border ownership of assets within the EU, it can be expected that the number of complaints and referrals to the Court about discriminatory aspects of Member States' inheritance tax laws will increase, as will double taxation. Notwithstanding the trends towards lower general levels of inheritance taxation, the overall tax burden arising from the interaction of different tax systems can have a significant impact in individual cases and this may increase in the future.

3.6. Does the EU have the right to act?

At the present stage of EU law, direct taxation, such as inheritance taxation, falls within the competence of the Member States, in the absence of EU harmonising rules. Nevertheless, in the exercise of this competence, Member States must respect their obligations under the Treaties. Member States are not allowed to discriminate on the basis of nationality or to apply unjustified restrictions to the exercise of the fundamental Treaty freedoms. As explained above, the Court has on several occasions in recent years investigated the compatibility of Member States inheritance tax provisions with the freedoms enshrined in the TFEU and ruled that "inheritance" comes within the compass of Article 63 TFEU on free movement of capital once its constituent elements are cross-border. The Commission has a role, as guardian of the Treaties, to ensure that Member States comply with EU law and to launch infringement proceedings where it believes that EU law has been infringed. Violations to fundamental freedoms must be eliminated as a matter of existing law, irrespective of the macroeconomic size of the problem in monetary terms.

Given the growing number of court cases, it is appropriate for the Commission to carry out an EU-wide examination of the potential and actual discrimination problems in the area of the taxation of inheritances and consider whether and what kind of action might be needed, including under Article 115 TFEU, to improve compliance with the fundamental freedoms in the area concerned. Such action could usefully complement the infringement proceedings that the Commission can, in any event, initiate.

As regards double taxation, it is clear from the complaints received, and from the replies to the public consultations, that problems of double taxation of inheritances are not currently being resolved in a satisfactory manner except to the extent that they are addressed by one of the few existing double taxation conventions dealing with, or extending to, inheritances.. This may deter individuals from exercising the right to move freely within the Internal Market. It is, therefore, also appropriate for the Commission, in the light of its responsibility for ensuring the smooth functioning of the Internal Market and promoting the general interest of the Union, to investigate the impact of the lack of appropriate mechanisms to prevent double taxation of inheritances and make recommendations or propose other action if warranted. The level of action would be proportionate to the objectives and could be a proposal for a Directive under Article 115, or a recommendation under Article 288, of the TFEU. Proportionality has been applied as one of the criteria to compare the options in section 7 below.

4. OBJECTIVES – THE “WHAT”

4.1. What are the general and the more specific policy objectives?

The general objective of the initiative is to allow citizens to exercise their right to move and operate freely within the Internal Market and not be deterred by cross-border inheritance tax obstacles. To this end, the initiative would aim at

- promoting the elimination of discrimination in the area of inheritance taxation; and
 - reducing the double taxation of inheritances within the EU,
- in particular in order to avoid an excessively high tax burden or even confiscatory rate of overall taxation.

Translation of these into operational objectives would imply:

- achieving a reduction in the number of complaints of EU citizens and requests from national courts for preliminary rules concerning discriminatory inheritance tax rules; and
- improved scope of national provisions relieving double taxation.

4.2. Are these objectives consistent with other EU policies?

Within the Internal Market, EU citizens should be able to move and operate freely across borders. In its "Europe 2020 strategy"²⁸ for smart, sustainable and inclusive growth in the EU, the European Commission concluded that an element of putting the EU economy back on track consists in empowering EU citizens to play a full part in the single market and giving them the confidence to do so. In the light of this strategy, and as announced in the Communication on "Removing cross-border tax obstacles for EU citizens"²⁹, the Commission wants to address the most important unresolved tax problems faced by EU citizens in cross-border situations, including cross-border inheritance tax obstacles. It seems appropriate, therefore, to examine how these difficulties can be best addressed.

An initiative addressing cross-border inheritance tax problems would complement the legislative proposal for a Regulation dealing with cross-border successions and wills which the Commission presented in October 2009. While that Regulation could, whether adopted or not, mean that the taxable beneficiaries of inheritances would change in some cases, it would not change Member States' laws on taxing cross-border inheritances. Thus, whether adopted or not, the Regulation will not address the situations where citizens taking advantage of the Internal Market are exposed to double taxation or to discriminatory rules on inheritances.

The Commission has been considering the problems that Member States' inheritance tax regimes could create for SMEs since 1994³⁰. As explained above, it is generally the actual application of inheritance taxes per se to transfers of businesses which create problems for SMEs. The present report concentrates on cross-border inheritance tax obstacles and does not challenge the existence of inheritance taxes. However, as explained above, solutions to the discrimination and double taxation issues would be applicable and beneficial also to those who inherit SMEs across borders.

The present initiative would also aim at supporting and complementing the Commission's infringement actions against discriminatory inheritance tax provisions.

Furthermore, it would be in line with the fundamental rights recognised by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (Charter) and indeed strengthen the citizens's position under certain headings (cf. below). Thus, measures adopted in order to eliminate double taxation would have a positive impact on the freedom to conduct business (Article 16 of the Charter), in particular with regard to SMEs, as well as on the right to property (Article 17), which specifically includes the right to bequeath lawfully acquired possessions. They will also have a positive impact on free movement of EU citizens (Article 45).

5. POLICY OPTIONS – THE “HOW”

5.1. Definition of policy options

Possible policy options to address the problems identified are listed below and briefly described. The preferred option could combine elements from both of these sets.

²⁹ COM (2010) 769 and Staff Working Paper SEC/2010/1576

³⁰ Most recently, Communication from the Commission to the Council, the European Parliament, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions: "Implementing the Lisbon Community Programme for Growth and Jobs. Transfer of Business – Continuity through a new beginning" COM (2006) 117 of 14.03.2006.

Definition of policy options A that address problems caused by tax discrimination of cross-border inheritances

- Policy Option A1: No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)
- Policy Option A2: - Publication of principles for non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems
- Policy Option A3: Compulsory rules on abolishing discriminatory features of Member States' domestic inheritance tax legislation

Definition of policy options B that address problems caused by unrelieved double taxation of cross-border inheritances

- Policy Option B1: No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)
- Policy Option B2: Addressing the problem by means of national legislation: Commission recommendation regarding (unilateral) national provisions designed to relieve double taxation of inheritances
- Policy Option B3: Commission recommendation regarding relief of double taxation through bilateral treaties between Member States designed to relieve double taxation of inheritances
- Policy Option B4 – Binding rules governing bilateral arrangements: Adoption into EU law of a) a single basis for determining the tax liability, such as the location of assets or the residence of the deceased, etc in bilateral relations or b) minimum standard common rules for bilateral conventions
- Policy Option B5– EU- wide multilateral double tax convention
- Policy Option B6: Binding EU-wide rules on relief from double taxation and even on taxation of inheritances

5.2. Description of policy options

5.2.1. Policy Options A: Addressing tax discrimination related to cross-border inheritances

Policy Option A1 – No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

Policy Option A2 Publication of principles for non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems

Under this option, a staff working paper would be developed that would assemble the principles of non-discrimination flowing from case-law and which need to be respected by national inheritance tax systems. These principles are summarised in section 3.3.1 above. Thanks to the publication of these principles, EU citizens would be more aware of the rules which Member States must respect when taxing cross-border inheritances. The document could also assist Member States in bringing their inheritance tax provisions into line with EU law. This would also support the Commission's legal action against infringements in the inheritance tax area.

Policy Option A3 - Compulsory rules on abolishing of discriminatory features of Member States' domestic inheritance tax legislation

Under this option, as suggested by some stakeholders in their replies to the inheritance tax consultation, the Commission would propose the principles set out in the relevant European case law for adoption as compulsory rules at EU level.

5.2.2. Policy Options B: Addressing unrelieved double taxation of cross-border inheritances

Policy Option B1 – No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

Policy Option B2 – Commission recommendation regarding (unilateral) national provisions designed to relieve double taxation of inheritances The Commission could identify the elements that would make national tax rules interact more coherently with each other so as to eliminate double taxation in a comprehensive way and invite Member States to make changes to their laws on that basis. The recommendation would aim to be a simple solution that would not entail changes to the different systems of inheritance taxation. It is likely to, inter alia, cover inheritances of both immovable and movable property and suggest an order of priority of taxing rights in cross-border cases, for example between the country of situs of property and any other countries involved (e.g. that of testator and that of heir). Some existing unilateral provisions may already contain some of these elements. Transparency of information on rules could also be encouraged.

Policy Option B3 – Commission recommendation regarding relief of double taxation through bilateral agreements between Member States designed to relieve double taxation of inheritances

The Commission could recommend that Member States complete a full network of bilateral double taxation conventions on inheritances, based either on the OECD model convention on estates, inheritances and gifts of 1982 (Policy Option B3.a) or an alternative model such as an EU model convention (Policy Option B3.b), or else include inheritance tax provisions within the scope of existing bilateral income tax conventions (Policy Option B3.c). Bilateral double taxation conventions share taxation, in the case of two countries that have taxing rights over income, on the basis of a set of principles defining concepts such as the location of assets or income, the basis of liability and the domicile or residence of the persons involved. They contain dispute resolution provisions which are not, however, binding on the two participating countries.

Policy Option B4 – Binding rules governing bilateral arrangements: Adoption into EU law of a) a single basis for determining the tax liability, such as the location of assets or the residence of the deceased, etc in bilateral relations, or b) minimum standard common rules for bilateral conventions. These suggestions were made by some stakeholders in their reply to the inheritance tax public consultation,

Policy Option B5 – EU-wide multilateral double tax convention As suggested by some stakeholders and commentators, one way to ensure that measures are taken to avoid double taxation would be for Member States to conclude a multilateral double taxation convention on estates and inheritances

Policy Option B6 - EU-wide legislative approach

An EU-wide binding instrument, taking the form of a Directive or a Regulation, could provide for i) a single harmonised basis for taxation, e.g. taxing only where the assets or the deceased were located (Policy Option B6.a); ii) a combination of common definitions plus a single harmonised basis (Policy option B6.b); (iii) the relief of double taxation alone, by way of a binding unilateral relief provision coupled with a binding dispute resolution mechanism without making any changes in Member States' inheritance tax rules (Policy Option B6.c); (iv) a combination of features of Policy Options B6.a, b and c i.e. single harmonised basis, common definitions and a binding dispute settlement mechanism (Policy Option B6.d).

5.3. Options that appear less appropriate

Policy Option B3.a - Recommendation that Member States complete a full network of bilateral double taxation treaties on inheritances, based on the OECD model convention on inheritance taxes As already indicated, the OECD Model on estates, inheritances and gifts is not up to date and does not deal with triangular situations. While the OECD Model Convention on Income and Capital is constantly updated, the Model Convention on Estates, Inheritances and Gifts has not been amended to address shortcomings identified and therefore would not resolve all the problems effectively. Another reason why the Model might not be an ideal point of departure is the fact that the OECD is currently considering its update. This process may take a considerable amount of time. Furthermore, it is uncertain whether Member States would conclude bilateral agreements based on the updated Model when they have not concluded them so far. Even if Member States did decide to do so, finalisation of such agreements could be a lengthy process.

Policy Option B4 - Binding rules governing bilateral arrangements: Adoption into EU law of a) a single basis for determining the tax liability, such as the location of assets or the residence of the deceased, etc in bilateral relations, or b) minimum standard common rules for bilateral conventions. Although suggested by some stakeholders, drawing up these rules would take a disproportionate amount of effort given that they would have to be adopted unanimously and then implemented via bilateral agreements. The effort involved in achieving this result in bilateral relations, might still leave the problem of multilateral situations unresolved, and would not solve the problem as long as Member States are not prepared to enter into bilateral inheritance tax agreements in the first place.

Policy Option B5 – EU- wide multilateral double tax convention Although such an EU-wide instrument could address triangular situations, where more than two Member States have taxing rights, it is very unlikely that Member States would agree on such a convention given a previous failed attempt at such a solution for income tax³¹. Moreover, such a convention if proposed by the Commission could only be proposed in the form of a Directive which would fall within Policy Option B.6.

One variation of Policy Option B6 – binding EU legislation in the format of a Regulation - would not be possible because the legal base (Article 115, TFEU) only provides for proposals for Directives.

Policy Option B.6.a - a single harmonised basis for taxation - which was suggested by some stakeholders would be an ineffective solution unless combined with common definitions such as of assets and with rules to deal with dual residence/nexus, as proposed in another sub option (Policy Option B.6.b). Therefore, Policy Option B.6.a appears inappropriate.

6. ANALYSIS OF IMPACTS OF THE POLICY OPTIONS

This chapter analyses the different Policy Options for eliminating discrimination and reducing double taxation of cross-border inheritances from the perspective of the most significant impacts. Given the nature of the proposed measures to address both problems, no direct environmental impacts are expected. Indirect environmental impacts might materialize as a consequence of increased mobility, but that factor would not be a particular consequence of any initiative addressing cross-border inheritance tax problems.

Administrative costs imposed on citizens and businesses will not be any different following any changes to current regimes, because taxpayers will always have to make declarations to two or more tax authorities in cross border situations. That is a fact of life that will not change as long as Member States have different tax systems. However, legal costs and the time and inconvenience involved in making complaints would be reduced if there was less discrimination and double taxation about which to complain. For tax administrations, again costs will not change much except that less cross-border inheritance tax problems would translate into fewer complaints and legal cases to handle.

As regards budgetary impacts on Member States' revenues, it is unlikely that the adoption of solutions to address cross-border inheritance tax problems would have a significant impact at macro level. Although some Member States could win or lose more than others depending on cross-border mobility and ownership of cross-border assets, the overall effects are likely to be small given the low share that inheritance taxes represent of Member States' total revenues (see 3.3.3). Above all, as it is not the macroeconomic but the microeconomic impact of the problem that could be significant, it is an issue of principle that solutions should be found even if a country only has to deal with a few cross-border inheritance tax cases per year. As far as social and economic effects are concerned, we focus on the impact of the options on the individuals concerned.

As regards the impacts on SMEs in particular, an SME test is attached.³²

Any initiative of the Commission to eliminate discriminatory, and double, taxation will have positive impact on the fundamental rights recognised in the Charter, with particular regard to the principle of non-discrimination (Article 21), the right to property (Article 17), freedom to conduct a business (Article 16) and EU citizens' right to move freely within the EU (Article 45).

6.1. Impact of the Policy Options addressing problems of discrimination (Policy Option A)

Policy Option A1 - No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

(i) Fundamental freedoms: The Commission would in any event continue to take actions against Member States that breach the non-discrimination principles in the TFEU so the relevant fundamental freedoms would not be compromised. (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations: Relying mainly on solutions that involve court actions implies high costs for both taxpayers and tax administrations. (iii) Social effects: As cross-border movement is likely to increase over the coming years, the remaining discriminatory features of Member States' domestic rules are likely to cause more problems. Continuation of the current situation is most likely to impact on the middle classes as the wealthy are likely to have tax advisers and poorer individuals are not as likely to inherit across borders. (iv) Economic effects: Doing nothing could affect cross-border mobility and mean that difficulties remain for those who actually move.

³² See Annex 6

Policy Option A2 – Publication of principles for non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems

(i) Fundamental freedoms: The publication of principles for non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems would promote the respect of fundamental freedoms to a greater extent than the status quo. (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations: Publication of the the principles applicable could reduce the need for court actions. (iii) Social and economic effects: This option should bring increased confidence about the implications of cross-border movement and more trust in the Internal Market.

Policy Option A3 - Compulsory rules on abolishing of discriminatory features of Member States' domestic inheritance tax legislation

(i) Fundamental freedoms: Compulsory rules on the design of non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems would prima facie promote fundamental rights to an even greater extent than providing guidance. (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations: There should be increased legal certainty which could reduce the need for court actions. (iii) Social and economic effects: This option should bring increased confidence about the implications of cross-border movement and more trust in the Internal Market.

6.2. Impact of the Policy Options addressing problems of double taxation (Policy Option B)

Policy Option B1 - No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

(i) Fundamental freedoms: Maintaining the status quo could mean that, in an increasing number of cases over time, tax payers could be confronted in cross-border inheritance tax cases with a combined tax burden higher than they would bear in a purely internal situation. In some cases, the overall burden resulting from double (or multiple) taxation can reach levels that could be considered confiscatory. Although double taxation as such has been not been considered incompatible with fundamental freedoms, it makes the exercise of these freedoms more difficult. (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations: The lack of availability of relief can be costly in individual cases, as indicated in the examples at Chapter 3.3.3. Member States' tax revenues, on the other hand, will benefit from continuing with their current relief systems. (iii) Social effects: As cross-border movement is likely to increase over the coming years, the absence of comprehensive double taxation relief is likely to cause more problems over time. The lack of comprehensive solutions is most likely to impact on the middle classes as the wealthy are likely to have tax advisers to help with tax planning and poorer individuals are not as likely to inherit across borders. (iv) Economic effects: Problems of double taxation do not at present appear to affect an important percentage of citizens but are likely to affect those citizens who make use of their right to engage in cross-border activity. The ensuing economic consequences might be important for those mobile citizens, depending on the individual situations.

Policy Option B2 –Commission recommendation regarding (unilateral) national provisions designed to relieve double taxation

(i) Fundamental freedoms: This option could help to reduce the number of instances in which cross-border inheritances are subjected to double taxation, which would ease the exercise of fundamental freedoms. (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations: Extending the level of double taxation relief available in cross-border inheritance tax cases would mean a reduction of costs for taxpayers and a loss of tax revenues for Member States. Tax administrations would also face the administrative costs of making changes to their tax rules. However, fewer complaints would also mean less case-handling costs. (iii) Social effects: As cross-border movement is likely to increase over the coming years, the availability of comprehensive double taxation relief is likely to benefit an increasing number of taxpayers over time, in particular the middle compared to wealthier classes. (iv) Economic effects: The availability of comprehensive double taxation relief for cross-border inheritances would certainly benefit those citizens who make use of their right to engage in cross-border activity.

Policy Option B3 – Commission recommendation regarding relief for double taxation through bilateral agreements between Member States

(i) Fundamental freedoms, (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations, (iii) Social effects, (iv) Economic effects: Similar to Policy Option B2 because both involve a Commission recommendation on action to be taken by Member States.

Policy Option B6 – Binding EU legislation in the form of a Directive

(i) Fundamental freedoms, (ii) Costs to taxpayers and tax administrations, (iii) Social effects, (iv) Economic effects: Binding EU legislation which would compel Member States either to design their tax systems in such a way as to prevent the likelihood of double taxation, or to give double taxation relief, would be likely to lead to more certain effects than the previous options.

7. COMPARISON OF MAIN OPTIONS

7.1. Definition of the assessment criteria

For assessing the policy options to eliminate discrimination (Policy Options A), the following criteria will be used:

- Incentive: Incentive for Member States to change their discriminatory rules
- Effectiveness: in terms of achieving the objective of enforcing EU law and increasing certainty regarding the types of provisions that are discriminatory
- Proportionality: Going no further in terms of EU measures than is necessary to achieve the objective
- Efficiency: The extent to which the objectives can be achieved for a given level of resources/at least cost
- Flexibility: Ease of adjustment to reflect changes in case law and domestic legislation

For assessing the policy options to reduce double taxation (Policy Options B), the following criteria will be used:

- Effectiveness: in terms of achieving the objective of reducing double taxation and ensuring certainty in this regard
- Proportionality: Going no further in terms of EU measures/EU harmonisation than is necessary to achieve the objective
- Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: The extent to which the objectives can be achieved for a given level of resources/at least cost, in particular regarding ease of implementation
- Flexibility: in terms of scope, ease of adjustability to reflect changes in laws and practices

7.2. Comparison of Policy Options A that address problems of tax discrimination related to cross-border inheritances

Policy Option A1 – No change Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

Incentive: While infringement proceedings and Court decisions in preliminary references regarding a given Member State may induce other Member States to make corresponding changes in their laws, maintaining the status quo might mean insufficient incentive for Member States to do so, in particular in a coordinated way. Furthermore, citizens may not be sufficiently aware of the obligations imposed on Member States' inheritance tax rules by EU law. Effectiveness: For the same reasons, this option does not seem to achieve the objective set out in Chapter 4.1. Proportionality: It does not conflict with proportionality standards. Efficiency: With the expected increase in cross-border movement the number of infringement cases and court actions may also increase which may lead to increases in legal and administrative costs in order to meet the objective of eliminating discrimination. Flexibility: Not relevant.

Policy Option A2 – Publication of principles for non-discriminatory inheritance tax systems

Incentive: The publication of these principles may make EU citizens more aware of the rules which Member States must respect when taxing cross-border inheritances. It could also assist Member States in bringing their inheritance tax provisions into line with EU law, in particular in a coordinated way. Effectiveness: The publication of such a set of principles would enable taxpayers to better understand the implications of EU law for Member States' inheritance tax systems and thus make it more likely that they are invoked vis-à-vis the national tax authorities in a useful manner. It would also improve the orientation of Member States as regards how to design their tax systems in a non-discriminatory way. Proportionality: This option would improve knowledge about the applicable principles, thereby complementing and completing the Commission's actions to tackle incompatibilities with EU law by way of infringement proceedings. Efficiency: Better knowledge about the principles applicable, both on the part of the citizens and of the Member States, could contribute to improving the compatibility with EU law of Member States' legislation and practice. This in turn could minimise the number of infringement cases and court actions in this area. Flexibility: The set of principles can be adapted to cater for evolutions in Court of Justice case law and new developments in Member States' laws. Policy Option A3 - Compulsory rules on abolishing of discriminatory features of Member States' domestic inheritance tax legislation

Incentive: Setting out the principles as compulsory rules at EU level would reinforce the compulsory effect of fundamental freedoms. Effectiveness: Within the scope of the compulsory rules thus set out, complete certainty would prevail as regards how to design tax systems in a non-discriminatory way. Proportionality: Proportionality standards would not be compromised by codifying case law. Efficiency: Even though compulsory rules would make crystal clear the principles that Member States would have to follow in the design of their tax systems, cost-effectiveness would be limited by the fact that jurisprudence had not yet time to clarify the full range of possible problems to which the very diverse national systems could give rise. This makes it difficult to formulate general principles through binding secondary legislation in a way which would add decisive value to the existing case law as such. Flexibility: It might not be possible to modify legislation in a sufficiently short timeframe to reflect evolutions in Court of Justice case law or new developments in Member States' tax laws.

7.3. Comparison of Policy Options B that address problems of unrelieved double taxation on cross-border inheritances

Policy Option B1 - No change. Continuation of current regime (baseline scenario)

Effectiveness: This option would not achieve the objective of reducing double taxation of cross-border inheritances within the EU. Proportionality: This option does not conflict with proportionality standards. Efficiency: With the expected increase in cross-border movement the cases of unrelieved double taxation in international successions may also increase. Member States may make changes to their domestic relief provisions or enter into bilateral arrangements on double taxation relief but this appears unlikely on the basis of practice to date. Flexibility and Ease of implementation: not relevant.

Policy Option B2 –Commission recommendation regarding (unilateral) national provisions designed to relieve double taxation

Effectiveness: Member States already generally apply double taxation relief provisions under their domestic law but these are not comprehensive, and therefore improvements to these provisions would help to meet the objective set out in Chapter 4.1. This option would not, however, impose any binding obligation on Member States to eliminate double taxation. Proportionality: No proportionality issue would arise, since this option would not involve harmonisation of Member States' laws. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: A recommendation for appropriate self-regulation may achieve the desired results without protracted, time-consuming discussions in the Council. For Member States, changing their own laws is obviously the most easily achievable target. It may well be that they could provide for a less formalistic approach to credit for foreign taxes on an inheritance by means of administrative guidance rather than by changing laws. Flexibility: This option should be designed to ensure that unilateral double taxation relief measures would have a sufficiently broad scope, would be easily adjustable to reflect changes in laws, and would allow administrative interpretation and a non-formalistic approach so as to ensure that double taxation is eliminated.

Policy Option B3 –Commission recommendation regarding relief of double taxation through bilateral agreements between Member States

Policy Option B.3.b - The Commission could recommend that Member States complete a full network of bilateral double taxation treaties on inheritances, based on an alternative model to the OECD model tax treaty drawn up as an EU model treaty

Effectiveness: If a comprehensive network of relevant double taxation treaties existed between Member States, this would help meet the objective outlined in Chapter 4.1. This option would not, however, impose any binding obligation on Member States to eliminate double taxation. Proportionality: No proportionality issue would arise, since this option would not involve harmonisation of Member States' laws. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: The Commission would first, in consultation with Member States, have to draw up a model double taxation treaty. This might take a considerable amount of time and it is uncertain whether agreements based on the model convention would then effectively be concluded when Member States have not concluded them so far. Even if Member States did decide to do so, their finalisation could be an extremely lengthy process. Flexibility: Tax treaties would require regular updating to reflect changes in laws if they are to eliminate double taxation successfully. Furthermore, bilateral tax treaties might not be capable of addressing problems resulting from taxation by more than two countries or and might be insufficiently flexible to respond quickly to unforeseen circumstances.

Policy Option B.3.c – The Commission could recommend the inclusion of inheritance tax provisions within the scope of existing bilateral income tax treaties (Policy Option B3.c).

Effectiveness: If inheritance tax provisions were included in a comprehensive network of double taxation treaties between Member States, this would help meet the objective of reducing double taxation of cross-border inheritances within the EU. However, this would assume that the provisions would be sufficiently comprehensive which might not be possible given that they would be included in a treaty with a different scope. Furthermore, this option would not impose any binding obligation on Member States to eliminate double taxation. Proportionality: This option would be in line with proportionality standards. It would not involve harmonisation of Member States' laws. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: Member States would have to reopen their bilateral tax treaties to include inheritance tax provisions which could be time-consuming. It is not, therefore, realistic to believe that this option could be put in place quickly. Flexibility: Tax treaties require regular updating to reflect changes in laws if they are to eliminate double taxation successfully. Furthermore, bilateral tax treaties might not be capable of addressing problems resulting from taxation by more than two countries or insufficiently flexible to quickly respond to unforeseen circumstances.

Policy Option B5 –Binding EU legislation

Policy Option B6.b - A Directive introducing common definitions and a single harmonised basis for taxation

Effectiveness: If such common definitions and a single harmonised basis for taxation were agreed, the objective outlined in Chapter 4.1 would be largely met. Proportionality: This option would involve substantial changes to Member States tax laws which would not be proportionate to the objective to be achieved, particularly given that some Member States do not currently have inheritance taxes. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: Agreement on such vast changes to Member States' inheritance tax laws would take considerable time and, given the unanimity rule for adoption of tax proposals, is most likely unrealistic. Flexibility: Such an instrument would have to be renegotiated if it proved insufficient in any way.

Policy Option B6.c – A Directive providing for binding unilateral relief coupled with a binding dispute resolution mechanism Effectiveness: If such an instrument were agreed, the objective outlined in Chapter 4.1 should be completely met. Proportionality: This option should not involve substantial changes to Member States' inheritance tax laws as it would deal only with the interaction of these diverse laws. However, it may not be necessary to meet the objectives sought. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: Agreement on this legal measure could take considerable time and, given the unanimity rule for adoption of tax proposals, might not be realistic. Flexibility: Such an instrument would have to be renegotiated if it proved insufficient in any way. Nevertheless, this provision could be made more flexible than the previous option. It would not deal with the details of Member States' inheritance tax laws so might be broad enough in scope to cater for later developments in those laws.

Policy Option B6.d – A Directive providing for a combination of features of Policy Options B6.b and c

Effectiveness: This option would fully meet the objective outlined in Chapter 4.1. Proportionality: This option would involve substantial changes to Member States tax laws which would probably be disproportionate to the objective to be achieved, particularly given the scale of the problem and given that some Member States do not currently have inheritance tax laws. Efficiency, in particular ease of implementation: Agreement on such vast changes to Member States' inheritance tax laws would take considerable time and, given the unanimity rule for adoption of tax proposals, is most likely unrealistic. Flexibility: Such an instrument would have to be renegotiated if it proved insufficient in any way.

7.4. Comparison tables

The following tables provide a comparison of the ratings of the policy options as negative, neutral or positive.

Table 10 – Comparison of policy options A that address problems caused by tax discrimination of cross-border inheritances

Criteria	A1 – no change	A2 – publication of a set of principles	A3 - legislation
Incentive to change law	0	+	+
Effectiveness	0	+	+
Proportionality	+	+	0
Flexibility	n/a	+	0

Conclusion: As regards policy options A, the preferred option is Policy Option A.2. This option, by supporting the Commission's infringement actions, would address the current tax discrimination problems efficiently, flexibly and in a cost-effective way.

Table 11 – Comparison of policy options B that address problems caused by unrelieved double taxation of cross-border inheritances

Criteria	B1 no change	B2 improved unilateral relief	B3.b Inheritance tax treaties based on EU Model	B3.c Income tax treaties with inheritance provisions	B6.b Binding common definitions and basis	B6.c Binding relief plus dispute settlement	B6.d B6.b + B6.c
Effectiveness	-	+	+	+	++	++	++
Proportionality	0	+	+	+	--	-	--
Efficiency/ease implementation	0	++	--	--	--	-	--
Flexibility	n/a	++	-	-	--	-	--

Conclusion: As regards policy options B, the preferred option is Policy Option B.2 as an effective and certainly proportionate way to tackle the problem. Other options would be significantly less cost-effective and there is a question mark over their political feasibility, given Member States' reactions during relevant discussions. This preference is also in line with the view of the experts consulted. Option B.6.c is one that may be considered at a later date if necessary in the light of the review of the implementation of Option B.2. The preference for Option B.2 over Options B3.b and B3.c, both of which concern solutions via bilateral actions by Member States, is also based on the fact that Member States do not seem to prioritise the conclusion or revision of double taxation treaties on inheritances.

8. THE PREFERRED OPTION

The preferred solution to deal with the two problems identified is a combination of policy options A.2 and B.2 and is, in brief:

The principles flowing from the case-law on inheritance taxes that should govern the design of inheritance tax systems could be assembled in a single, published document. As explained above, Member States are obliged to take action to remove discrimination but they sometimes adapt their laws to take account of the Court's decisions in an incomplete way, or in a way that worsens the positions of taxpayers. The publication of these principles would improve the operation of the fundamental freedoms by assisting Member States in bringing their inheritance tax rules into line with EU law and by making EU citizens aware of the principles which Member States must respect when taxing cross-border inheritances. This would support the Commission's legal action against infringements in the inheritance tax area. The principles would, for example, describe the types of rules which the Court has identified as breaches of the fundamental freedoms - see 3.3.1 above.

The publication of these principles could help to ensure that EU citizens who are caught up in complicated cross-border inheritance disputes are informed in a quick and efficient way about their legal position. This could make it easier for them to invoke their rights vis-à-vis the tax authorities at an early stage, which in turn could help to reduce the incidence of these matters on the lengthiness of any legal proceedings. It could, help to ensure that problems of EU citizens, confronted for example with a significantly higher tax burden through not qualifying for an exemption or for more beneficial valuation rules because either the assets or the deceased and/or the beneficiary were located outside the taxing Member State, are solved more rapidly.

In addition, the Commission could adopt a Recommendation identifying the elements that would make the very disparate national tax rules interact more coherently with each other, without in any way harmonising those laws, so as to eliminate double taxation in a comprehensive way. The Recommendation would suggest that Member States make changes to their domestic mechanisms for double taxation relief on that basis. It could suggest an order of priority of taxing rights in cross-border cases, for example between the country of situs of property and any other countries involved (e.g. that of the deceased and that of the heir); it could propose a less formalistic approach to credit for foreign taxes on an inheritance e.g. credit to be allowed to an heir subject to inheritance tax for foreign tax imposed on the basis of the estate; it could suggest credit for all foreign taxes on an inheritance irrespective of the type of tax and of whether it is applied at national or local level; and it could propose retroactive credit for foreign inheritance taxes applied at a later date on an inheritance. The ultimate aim could be to ensure that the overall tax burden on a cross-border inheritance would not be higher than in an internal situation.

Assuming the existence of this unilateral relief mechanism, the taxpayers referred in our examples in 3.3.2 would only bear tax comparable to a domestic situation.

Member States all subscribe to the international principle that double taxation is to be avoided and already under their domestic law apply a measure of relief for foreign inheritance taxes. They appear to do so without reference to budgetary implications. Therefore the impact of making these already-existing unilateral reliefs work better in practice should neither be considerable nor objectionable. In addition, as explained above, improving the existing unilateral relief provisions might not even involve changes in the legislation of Member States, as the objective might be achieved by means of administrative guidance interpreting the relevant provisions. In relation to the distributional effects across Member States, while the migration flow from the North to the South seems to be of particular relevance, it is an issue of principle that Member States with few cross-border inheritance complaints per year should also apply relief in those individual cases.

While the adoption of the Regulation on cross-border successions would be helpful in clarifying the civil law background, it would not address the problems presented in this report. In addition, the preferred solution outlined in this report would not interfere with the underlying private law divergences as it would not incorporate any private law concepts. The Recommendation would, therefore, have no impact on the outcome of the future Regulation.

The combination of the two options is appropriate to deal with cross-border inheritance tax problems comprehensively.

While administrative costs will not change considerably on the basis of this initiative, the legal costs and the time and inconvenience for both taxpayers and tax administrations would certainly be reduced if there was less discrimination and double taxation about which to complain.

9. MONITORING AND EVALUATION

In order to monitor the success of the principles eliminating discrimination and the Recommendation on reducing double taxation, the Commission could prepare regular evaluation reports based on monitoring Member States' relevant domestic practices in areas covered by the initiatives. The first evaluation could be carried out 3 years after adoption of the initiatives. Member States could be asked in the meantime to record cross-border inheritance tax revenues and complaints and inform the Commission of any changes made to their domestic inheritance tax laws. There are two broad areas where refined and systematic data collection appears necessary.

First, the overall extent of the problem could be monitored. Data should be collected on an annual basis on cross-border migration; cross-border ownership of assets (including financial assets and immovable property); and domestic inheritance tax rates.

Second, the legal background to cross-border inheritance cases could be examined. This would cover the amendments to Member States' domestic law to remove discrimination and reduce double taxation; the evolution of bilateral agreements; and relevant Court cases.

Regular expert meetings could take place to discuss the current state of play and possible implementation problems. The Commission's right to present a legislative proposal in the future, if deemed appropriate, would, of course, remain unaffected.

ANNEX 1: COMPARISON OF INCOME/CAPITAL TAXATION AND INHERITANCE/ESTATE TAXATION

The taxation of inheritances and estates presents problems which have no exact counterpart in income/capital taxation.

In general terms, income/capital taxation is imposed on the income or capital gains of a taxable person, while inheritance and estate taxes are levied on the assets included in an inheritance, which is transferred from one person to another.

In the first case, the taxable event is the receipt of income by a taxable person. In the second case, the taxable event is either the transfer of property from one person to another (estate tax) or the enrichment of a person on the death of another (inheritance tax).

The peculiar nature of inheritance/estate taxes entails that, in the great majority of cases, they are levied on individuals, while income taxes are levied on both individuals and companies (where the revenue generated from companies are the most relevant).

Another important difference lies in the connecting factors that are normally used by countries to establish a link between one person and their territories with a view to exercising their taxation rights on that person. In accordance with internationally accepted principles, income/capital taxes are levied by countries on persons who are resident in their territories (residence principle) as well as on income that is sourced in their territories (source principle). Normally, residents are taxed on a worldwide base (i.e. on all their income, regardless of the source), while source State taxation is limited to the specific type of income that can be considered as sourced in that State.

On the other hand, in the case of inheritance/estate taxes the personal nexus may vary considerably from one country to another (residence, domicile, nationality, etc.) and may apply with respect to the deceased, the heir or both. Countries also apply a territorial nexus and therefore tax assets that are situated in their territories. In principle, if the personal nexus is satisfied, taxing rights are exercised on a worldwide base, while the territorial link gives rise to taxation solely on assets situated in the territory of the State. However, some countries exempt foreign real estate even in the presence of a personal nexus.

The lack of uniformity of connecting factors in the area of inheritance/estate taxes, unlike income/capital taxes (where connecting criteria are more or less similar and follow international practice), give rise to potential exposure of inheritances to double or even multiple taxation and justifies different solutions in the two fields. Moreover, also in general terms, it seems that rules in the inheritance/estate tax area vary much more from one Member State to another than in the income tax area.

Relief from double taxation is provided, in both cases, by means of unilateral mechanisms or by negotiating bilateral tax treaties.

Domestic rules on foreign tax credit in the field of inheritance/estate tax are generally modelled on relief provision laid down for income tax purposes. However, while the provisions related to income taxes are normally very detailed and/or accompanied by administrative guidance clarifying their scope and functioning, the domestic rules concerning unilateral relief in the field of inheritance/estate taxes are very basic and there is very little guidance on them. Moreover, the reliance on income tax provisions is problematic because the different connecting factors and tax legislation give rise to double taxation issues which are very peculiar to the inheritance/estate tax field and not common to income/capital taxes.

As far as double taxation treaties are concerned, it should be noted that the differences between inheritance/estate taxes as opposed to income taxes led the OECD to draw up a Model Convention on Estates and Inheritances (MCEI) which constituted a self-contained document with no reference to its Model Convention on Income and Capital (MCIC).

While the rationale behind the two Models is the same (i.e. sharing of taxation powers between the two Contracting States), there are important differences, for example:

- the MCIC refers to "persons" while the MCEI refers to "the deceased";
- the connecting factors mentioned in the MCIC are "residence" and "source", while the MCEI refers to "domicile" and "source";
- the MCIC is much more detailed than the MCEI.

Of course, there are also some similarities, such as the following provisions that are included in both Models:

- tie-breaker rules;
- exchange of information;
- non-discrimination;
- methods for eliminating double taxation.

However, it should be noted that while the network of bilateral income tax treaties is almost complete and the relevant MCIC is kept updated, there are only few bilateral conventions between Member States in the inheritance tax area (there are, in fact, only 33 bilateral inheritance tax treaties between Member States out of a possible total of 351) and the MCEI dates back to 1982.

ANNEX 2: MAIN FEEDBACK RECEIVED IN THE RELEVANT PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS

In 2010 the Commission launched a public consultation on the internet to obtain views from all interested stakeholders and individuals on the extent of cross-border inheritance tax obstacles within the EU and ideas on possible solutions. Stakeholders were also invited to comment on any actual or potential cross-border inheritance tax problems of which they are aware and to suggest solutions to these problems. The consultation paper listed possible solutions already mentioned in literature and commentaries, such as guidance on interpretation of EU case law to help Member States in designing their inheritance tax systems in a way that is compatible with EU law; and unilateral, bilateral and EU-level solutions to the problem of double taxation.

The key questions to which stakeholders were invited to reply were the following:

- 1) Have you any information on cross-border inheritance tax problems in the EU that you would like to provide?
- 2) Which or which combination of the above outlined approaches do you consider as most appropriate to tackle any cross-border inheritance problems that exist? Why do you prefer that option?
- 3) Would you prefer a completely different solution and if so what solution do you suggest?
- 4) What, if anything, else do you think could be done at European level to overcome any difficulties that exist in the area of inheritance taxes?
- 5) Do you have knowledge of cross-border inheritance tax problems faced by SMEs and, if so, do you think that the above-mentioned or different solutions are needed for any such problems?
- 6) Do you have any other comment or thoughts to share as regards cross-border inheritance tax issues?

The Commission published, as a reference document in connection with this consultation, a study by external consultants on inheritance taxes in EU Member States and possible mechanisms to resolve problems of double inheritance taxation in the EU³³. The study explored the nature of cross-border inheritance tax problems, i.e. discrimination and double taxation; the economic significance of the problems; and possible policy solutions to the problems.

The consultation ran from 25 June to 22 September 2010, but at the request of several stakeholders, the deadline was later extended to 22 October 2010. The Commission also accepted a number of contributions received after the deadline.

There were in total 232 replies to the consultation from a broad range of stakeholders, including 205 individual citizens (23 replied directly while 183 responses were submitted through a newspaper with one overlap in that one of those contributions was also sent directly to the Commission), 13 academics and tax practitioners individually or through their associations, 3 non-registered and 9 registered organisations, and 2 public authorities.

This summary also takes account of the replies on inheritance tax sent in response to the more general public consultation on double taxation problems that the European Commission conducted from 24 April to 30 June 2010³⁴. There were 2 such replies and some stakeholders expressed their views in reply to both consultations.

The consultation paper and the external study can be accessed at:

http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/common/consultations/tax/2010_06_inheritance_en.htm

2. GENERAL COMMENTS

In general, respondents expressed their appreciation at the launch of this public consultation initiative and emphasised that there was a strong need to tackle tax obstacles to cross-border inheritances. The majority of replies also concurred with the main findings of the external study and with the Commission's own research.

Some stakeholders, including tax practitioners and associations, also drew attention to the in-depth discussion of cross-border inheritance tax issues at the 64th Annual Congress of the International Fiscal Association (IFA) in Rome in September. Several contributors emphasised that as people increasingly move across borders within the EU, the problems related to cross-border inheritance taxation can only increase in the future. Stakeholders therefore welcomed the Commission's efforts to put this issue on the political agenda.

3. KEY ISSUES

A. Evidence of the existence of cross-border inheritance tax problems within the EU

1) The discrimination problem

Many respondents of all types (individual citizens, academic representatives, tax practitioners and organisations) reported on possible discriminatory provisions of domestic inheritance tax legislation. The competent Commission services are currently examining these complaints about discrimination with a view to asking Member States to amend the relevant laws if they do indeed involve a conflict with the Treaty on the functioning of the EU.

2) The double taxation problem

In the recent public consultation on actual cases of double taxation, including of inheritances, some contributors, including tax practitioners and citizens provided real-life examples of double taxation of inheritances. Others provided similar responses to the present consultation.

The majority of the replies described as the underlying causes of this phenomenon the various types of mismatches between different national inheritance rules.

Many pointed out that, to start with, Member States differ considerably both as regards their civil legislation and their tax legislation in the field of inheritances. The basic difference in concept between the civil law and common law systems concerns the transfer of assets. While civil law countries follow the principle of direct transmission, where the inheritance is directly transferred from the deceased person to the heirs, under common law the assets, rights and obligations are first transferred to a personal representative who deals with the administration of the estate and then transfers the net assets to the heirs. Some contributors, including tax practitioners and lawyers, noted also the difficulties concerning the civil law countries' treatment of trusts and personal representatives, which are characteristic features of the common law concept of inheritances. For instance, double taxation may arise if a civil law Member State considers the trust or a personal representative as a different taxable person to the beneficiary or regards the testator as the owner of the trust property and charges tax on the trust on the death of the testator.

³⁴ http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/common/consultations/tax/2010_04_doubletax_en.htm

Respondents also pointed to discrepancies between Member States' inheritance tax systems as there are great varieties in the rules, leading to different taxable persons, different taxable events and different bases of taxation.

Some Member States apply a tax on the heirs, while other Member States apply a tax on the basis of the estate. In both cases tax liability is determined on the basis of a connecting factor or "nexus", which can be the residence, domicile or nationality of the deceased, or the residence, domicile or nationality of the beneficiary, or the location of the inherited property, or a combination of these factors. Furthermore definitions and meanings of these terms can differ from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, so for instance an individual can be "domiciled" for inheritance tax law purposes in one country and at the same time be "habitually resident" under the inheritance tax law of another. In addition, several Member States apply anti-abuse measures which provide for an extended concept of residence or domicile. Difficulties with determining the tax residence of the deceased were also highlighted, such as possible complications related to temporary residence.

Other significant differences between Member States' rules that respondents emphasised were different valuation methods regarding real estates, and usufruct of personal assets and business assets; and the diverging conditions for deducting debts and liabilities. Double taxation problems could also be exacerbated by the fact that some Member States apply high inheritance tax rates for certain groups of beneficiaries. Many stakeholders, mostly individual citizens, pointed to inordinately high rates and the lack of exemptions for non-relatives or distant relatives. This was particularly a problem in regard to stepchildren.

As for the existing mechanisms in place to eliminate double taxation of cross-border inheritances, the situation is far from ideal in the view of stakeholders. They complained about the very low number of bilateral tax treaties concluded between Member States for the avoidance of double taxation on estate and inheritance tax (there are, in fact, only 33 bilateral inheritance tax treaties between Member States out of a possible total of 351) and they also pointed out that the current OECD Model Convention on Inheritance and Estate Tax has not been updated since 1982. Limited availability of treaty relief for foreign located property and varying rules regarding allocation of taxing rights in those tax treaties were also mentioned as shortcomings in the existing bilateral tax relief mechanisms.

Turning to the limitations of the current measures of double taxation relief under domestic law -the so-called unilateral relief mechanisms - many mismatches were pointed out which lead either to incomplete or non-availability of relief. Mismatches can also occur as a result of differences between common law and civil law systems. There can be different characterisations of the transfer of assets, and there can be different tax rules in place regarding what is a taxable event and who is the taxable person.

In addition, unilateral reliefs may have a limited scope as regards the taxes covered, such as applying only to inheritance or estate tax and not, for example, to income taxes on inheritances. In this respect, many contributors emphasised the importance of clear rules regarding the characterisation of taxes which apply on death.

Furthermore, it may not always be possible to credit foreign local inheritance taxes, i.e. taxes applied by political subdivisions at local rather than national level.

In addition, unilateral reliefs may not cover all cases of double taxation, for instance due to the narrow definition of "foreign located assets" used in the domestic provisions for granting tax credit. In this regard, the conflicting definitions of domestic and foreign located assets, in particular in relation to bank assets, were identified as a serious concern for stakeholders³⁵.

Another general problem pointed out was the limitation of credit to foreign tax paid on foreign property, thereby excluding foreign tax on assets located within the territory of the Member State granting relief.

Many contributors mentioned further limitations of the existing tax credits concerning the material scope. This included divergence between the different tax systems regarding the definition of immovable versus movable property, or when relief is limited only to real estate.

Incomplete tax credit due to different valuation methods or the different allocation of debts was also widely reported as a serious shortcoming.

Relief that was subject to reciprocity or to the discretion of the competent authority was also considered problematic.

As a general remark concerning the above-mentioned problems of double taxation of a single inheritance, some stakeholders, including individual citizens and tax practitioners also pointed out that expert advice is highly needed, which can prove costly and time consuming.

3) Miscellaneous

A large number of individual citizens expressed their frustration with the substantive inheritance law applicable to their cross-border successions. Their particular concern is about the forced heirship rules under civil law that allow testators less freedom about whom to make their beneficiaries.

In this context, it is worth noting that on 14 October 2009 the Commission presented a legislative proposal for a Regulation dealing with cross-border successions and wills³⁶. This Regulation would provide for the use of a single basis for determining the competent authorities and the applicable law that would apply in the case of a succession. It would also enable citizens living abroad to choose to have the law of their country of nationality made the law applicable to their entire succession.

³⁵ In this respect a great deal of reference was made to the Block case (case C-67/08 Block), where bank assets held abroad did not qualify as foreign located asset for being eligible for unilateral relief. Nevertheless, the CJEU stated that Member States are not obliged to eliminate double taxation on inheritance based on a parallel exercise of two tax jurisdictions.

³⁶ Proposal for a Regulation of the European Parliament and of the Council on jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of decisions and authentic instruments in matters of succession and the creation of a European Certificate of Succession, COM(2009)154 fin. of 14 October 2009.

The proposed Regulation does not deal with tax matters so would not, therefore, reduce the number of situations where citizens taking advantage of the Internal Market are exposed to double taxation or to discriminatory rules on inheritances. In this respect, some stakeholders pointed out that a proposal to address cross-border inheritance tax obstacles would be a timely initiative.

B. Possible approaches to cross-border inheritance tax problems

1) Solutions to the discrimination problem

To tackle the discrimination problem, some stakeholders agreed that it could be helpful if the Commission provided the Member States with guidelines on how to bring their inheritance tax systems into line with EU law. Some also suggested that the principles set out in the relevant European case law should be established as compulsory rules at EU level.

2) Solutions to the double taxation problem

Stakeholders were asked for their views on the most appropriate solution or solutions to address the issue of unrelieved double or multiple taxation of a single inheritance. Many suggested several different solutions.

A quarter of the opinions on the suggested solutions concerned the unilateral relief mechanisms. Even though some contributors, including tax practitioners, pointed out possible shortcomings of such a system (for instance its inability to address all double taxation problems), the vast majority advocated the need to improve such unilateral solutions.

Many of them envisaged unilateral solutions as short term measures, or as complementary solutions to completing the gaps in the relevant bilateral treaty network.

In addition, some stakeholders, including tax practitioners, suggested introducing either an EU model relief provision or an EU-wide standard in the form of a Directive.

A third of the opinions on the suggested approach concerned bilateral solutions. Some expressed the view that it would be unrealistic to expect Member States to complete the relevant treaty network. On the other hand, more stakeholders, including individual citizens, tax practitioners, organisations and a public authority, argued for a comprehensive treaty network in this area, stressing the effectiveness of such a network, even if the negotiation and conclusion of such treaties could be time-consuming. Some contributors also explicitly expressed a preference for greater treaty coverage, either by the update of the OECD Model Convention on Inheritance and Estate Tax which has remained unchanged since 1982, or by drawing up an EU Model Treaty. A few argued for including inheritance tax provisions within the scope of bilateral income tax treaties. Another idea suggested was to establish EU minimum standard common rules for bilateral conventions.

Around half of the opinions on the suggested approach concerned solutions at EU level. While a few stakeholders, including associations, considered that the introduction of binding mechanisms in this area was not an EU competence, many contributors suggested EU wide solutions to cover all situations which unilateral or bilateral solutions could not address. Many argued for harmonised common concepts and definitions – such as for location (situs) of inheritances or for the residence or permanent residence of the testator/beneficiary. Some suggested introducing an Arbitration Convention or a Multilateral Treaty. The majority of stakeholders, including individual citizens, academics, tax practitioners, organisations and a public authority advocated the establishment of common rules to determine the basis of taxation. Most of these were in favour of common rules regarding taxation on the basis of the location of the assets of an inheritance, though some suggested adopting as the basis of taxation that of the (last permanent) residence of the deceased, with in some cases an exception for immovable property.

As for the form of any possible EU-wide binding mechanism, more explicitly favoured a Directive than a Regulation. In addition, some stakeholders, including tax practitioners, raised the abolition of inheritance taxes as a possible solution to eliminate double taxation.

3) Miscellaneous

Some stakeholders, including tax practitioners and associations suggested that a future initiative on inheritance taxation should cover gift taxes as well.

In other contributors' views, any upcoming proposal should also address the tax treatment of usufructs, donations and distributions out of trusts and foundations.

Other stakeholders, including also tax practitioners and associations, pointed out that improved transparency in this area would be very helpful; to this end, several suggestions were made, such as a relevant website or setting up "consulates" in charge of cross-border inheritance issues.

C. Cross-border inheritance tax problems faced by small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and possible solutions

As regards the problems related to transfer of business in the case of the death of an SME owner, many stakeholders expressed the view that both discrimination and double taxation can create barriers to continuity.

Possible discriminatory issues in Belgium and Germany were reported in this regard, and the difference in the level of tax exemptions available in the various Member States was also highlighted.

As for tackling cross-border inheritance tax obstacles for SMEs, the suggested solutions in the majority of replies did not differentiate between the position of individual citizens and businesses.

Nevertheless, some contributors, including tax practitioners and organisations suggested particular solutions for SMEs, such as a common EU framework for business property relief which could be set out in EU-wide harmonised exemption rules; or including a provision on the transfer of business into an EU Model Convention on inheritances.

ANNEX 3: SHORT OVERVIEW OF THE ESTABLISHED CASE-LAW OF THE COURT IN THE INHERITANCE TAX AREA

Inheritance/gift tax cases where the Court ruled against Member States

The Court ruled in the Barbier case (Case C-364/01) that a Member State cannot apply inheritance tax rules which would allow a certain deduction from the value of an estate if the testator lived in that Member State at the time of death but would deny it if the testator resided in another Member State prior to death.

The court established in the Maria Geurts case (Case C-464/05) that Member States cannot deny an exemption to inheritances of family undertakings which employed at least five workers in another Member State when it would allow such an exemption from inheritance tax if the five workers had been employed in the same Member State.

In the Jager case (Case C-256/06), the Court ruled that the free movement of capital provisions of the Treaty prohibited Member States from applying for inheritance tax purposes a special favourable valuation system and partial exemption for assets located in that Member State while calculating the value of assets situated in other Member States according to normal fair market value rules.

In the Eckelkamp and Arens-Sikken cases (Cases C-11/07 and C-43/07 respectively) the Court found incompatible with the free movement of capital the application of different tax rules for the assessment of inheritance and transfer taxes payable in respect of assets, depending on whether the deceased resided in that Member State or abroad at the time of his/her death.

In the Mattner case (Case C-510/08), the Court decided that a German gift tax provision according to which the tax allowance for non-residents is smaller than that for residents is in breach of the free movement of capital.

In the Missionswerk Werner Heukelbach case (Case C-25/10) the Court decided that a Member State granting certain inheritance tax advantages to domestic charities has to apply the same tax treatment to foreign charities if the foreign charities satisfy the conditions laid down in that Member State for the granting of tax advantages.

In the Halley case (Case C-132/10) the Court found it discriminatory to set different limitation periods for the valuation of registered shares for inheritance tax purposes depending on whether the centre of effective management of the issuing company, in which the deceased was a stakeholder, was situated in the taxing Member State or in another State.

Inheritance/gift tax cases where the Court ruled in favour of Member States

The Court decided in the Hilten-van Der Heijden case (Case C-513/03) that the free movement of capital provisions of the EC Treaty did not prevent a Member State from taxing the estate of a national of that Member State who lived abroad at the time of death, under rules allowing taxation if the testator dies within 10 years of ceasing to resident in that Member State. The provisions at issue were not considered discriminatory because they did not apply different rules concerning property depending on the place where the deceased was resident or depending on the location of the assets.

In the Block case (Case C-67/08) the Court concluded that Member States are not under any legal obligation to avoid double taxation on inheritance which arises from the exercise in parallel by Member States of fiscal sovereignty or, therefore, to set inheritance tax paid abroad against their own inheritance tax.

Other relevant cases

As a result of the Stauffer and Persche cases (Cases C-386/04 and C-318/07 respectively), it can be concluded that national provisions imposing higher inheritance or gift duties for legacies and gifts made to charities established in other Member States, or that provide for tax exemptions from inheritance/gift tax on condition that the recipient is a domestic charity, may be contrary to EU law.

ANNEX 4: SURVEY OF THE DOMESTIC RULES ON TAXES LEVIED UPON DEATH

This attachment established by the Copenhagen Economics provides an overview of some of the domestic rules on taxes levied upon death in the 27 Member States. The survey is limited to taxes that are levied exclusively in event of death implying that taxes levied both upon death and under other circumstances are not covered by the survey.

The first section focuses on the Member States with inheritance or estate taxes, i.e. taxes that are levied upon death from the deceased or the heirs.

The second section focuses on the Member States with no inheritance or estate taxes.

A) Member States with inheritance or estate taxes

The survey has revealed that 18 of the 27 Member States of the European Union have an inheritance or estate tax on the domestic tax rules. Most Member States have inheritance taxes, and few have estate taxes. Denmark has as the only Member State an estate tax as well as an inheritance tax, cf. Table 1.

Tax rates

Tax rates vary according to:

1. The degree of kinship between the beneficiary and the deceased,
2. The net share inherited by each of the heirs
3. The Region where the inheritance is opened.

If the deceased was a resident, the inheritance is opened in the region where his last fiscal domicile was located.

If the deceased was not a resident, the inheritance is opened, in principle, in the Region where the estate is located.

B) Member States without inheritance or estate taxes

The survey has revealed that 9 of the 27 Member States do not have an inheritance or estate tax.

The absence of inheritance and estate taxes does not imply that no tax is levied on transfers upon death. In all Member States with no inheritance or estate taxes, except Slovakia, other more general taxes may apply to the transfer to the heirs. All of these taxes are, however, not only payable upon death, but also under other circumstances where the value of the assets is realized. A few of the Member States have entered into inheritance tax treaties despite they do not have an inheritance tax themselves.

This section provides a brief overview of the relevant other taxes in these 9 Member States.

Relevant taxes upon death in Member States without inheritance and estate tax

Relevant taxes and bilateral tax treaties
Austria	Acquisitions of land upon death are subject to land transfer tax. Inheritance tax treaties are in force between Austria and the following Member States: Sweden (1963), Hungary (1976), France (1994), the Czech Republic (2000) and the Netherlands (2003).
Cyprus	Donation taxes are imposed on the transfer of real estate by donation between family members. The tax is levied on the value at the written deed at varying rates, depending on the relationship between the donor and the beneficiary.
Estonia	A state fee is payable on the issue of a succession certificate. Notary fees are also payable on different procedures. There are up to 11 different fees that are payable for deeds related to succession. Most of them are lump sum.
Latvia	Income or assets derived through inheritance are exempt from personal income tax, with the exception of royalties gained from inherited intellectual/artistic property. Sale of an inherited asset would however be subject to capital gains tax, where the taxable profit would be calculated as a difference between the sales price and the inheritance value. The legislation does not differentiate taxation approach, values or rates based on the location of the asset.
Malta	A stamp duty is payable by the heir at 5% of the declared property value. If the property is jointly owned by spouses, and one of the spouses has died, 5% is levied on only half the value of the property. While no relief for double taxation is available in Malta with respect to Maltese stamp duty, current revenue practice is not to impose stamp duty on transfers of foreign immoveable property and foreign marketable securities upon death.
Portugal	A stamp duty applies upon the death of an individual on the transfer of the assets that constitute the succession estate. The stamp duty is a territorial tax of 10%. Descendants, spouses and people living as married couples are tax exempt on transfer upon death, regardless of tax residency.
Romania	A real estate tax is applicable in case of real estate properties transferred from the personal patrimony of individuals. It is provided that in case of transfer of the ownership right over real estate properties by way of inheritance, if the inheritance procedures are not completed in two years periods, the heirs (individuals, both residents and non-residents) are liable to pay towards the State Budget a 1% tax applicable to the value of the real estate properties included in the inheritance.
Slovakia	-
Sweden	- Inheritance tax treaties are in force between Sweden and the following Member States: Hungary (1936), the Netherlands (1952), Belgium (1958), Italy (1958), Austria (1963), Spain (1963), the UK (1980), Nordic countries (1989), Germany (1992), and Germany (1994).

ANNEX 6: SME TEST

(1) Consultation with SMEs representatives	See section 2.2. A summary of the stakeholders' replies is available on the consultation website. The contribution of the European Family Businesses-GEEF (the pan-European umbrella federation for national associations representing long-term family owned enterprises, including small, medium-sized and larger companies) is also available on its website⁴².
(2) Preliminary assessment of businesses likely to be affected	See section 3.4 ("Who is affected") as well as Copenhagen Economics Study, subchapter 2.3 "Transfer of family-owned business". See also section 3.3.1 and 3.3.2 and Annex 4 for an analysis of the inheritance tax rules in Member States.
(3) Measurement of the impact on SMEs	See section 4.2 and 6. The policy options other than "Do nothing" could benefit those who inherit SMEs across borders.
(4) Assess alternative options and mitigating measures	The conclusion of the impact assessment contains no indication that the selected options might result in a disproportionate burden for SMEs. Consequently, there is no need for SME specific measures.
